Published duration 2 September 2012 image caption The attack affected websites and mobile apps used by shoppers at Tesco's UK stores A cyber attack has knocked out a major UK retailer's websites, mobile apps and shopping cart services. The shoppers affected were buying from Tesco's stores and clicking through its websites, not going directly to its online service. The supermarket chain said the attack was carried out by "advanced persistent threats", which are harder to identify than hacktivists and are often state-sponsored. Tesco said its website was hit by 200,000 automated hits. Warnings were issued when a major database of customers' details was brought down with the "denial of service" attack. The company said a number of its suppliers had also been hit, but it added that there was no evidence so far that any customer data had been stolen. Amazon said last week that its subsidiary Amazon Web Services had also been affected. Previous cyber attacks The BBC understands that the attack started on Friday and lasted until Sunday evening. Other cyber attacks on retailers this year include: A crippling denial of service attack on the UK arm of the online car retailer Autotrader, which was disrupted by hackers for more than a week in April A similar attack on the MoneySuperMarket website in February, a month before its merger with Blackhawk, in which the Group's website was taken offline for 12 hours A similar attack on the likes.com website in May, which saw more than two million user accounts stolen Tories attack Tesco A Tory MP has said Tes
