Creating a realistic background The Brush tool is very similar to many paint programs. You have a window, can brush with a closed fist (hand tool) or a brush with an open fist (pencil tool). If you _brush_ with the pen tool, you create a set of lines by tracing a closed path. You can use a brush with or without a texture — a file that contains effects, such as shadows, textures, and colors — but be aware that if you aren't aware of the effects you're using, you can inadvertently change them. The next sections explain how to create a background in different ways. The first step in creating a background is to select a new empty canvas. This canvas is large enough to allow you to do all your painting. When you're ready to create your base image, you can use your Pen tool or the Brush tool to create the object or subject. Don't forget to add a layer mask to protect whatever layer you're working on. (Refer to Chapter 7 if you need help creating a layer mask.) To create a background, you need to plan and sketch the object or set that will eventually be painted on the canvas. Although you can create backgrounds with a simple straight line, a fine texture (or brush) is more realistic. Here's an example of painting with the Brush tool

Biological properties of human monocytic myeloid leukaemia cells. The putative biological behaviours of the human promonocytic leukaemia cells in culture were investigated in relation to their functional susceptibility to mitogenic stimulation and the cellular capacity for phagocytosis, antibody-dependent cellular cytotoxicity and the production of tumour necrosis factor. Each of the mitogenic stimulations caused a small increase in the incorporation of tritiated thymidine (3H-TdR), and each elicited the expected increase in nitroblue tetrazolium (NBT) reduction. The cells in monolayer culture exhibited significant NBT reduction when treated with two of the mitogenic stimuli, whereas the phagocytic capacity was reduced, but to a lesser extent. Tumour necrosis factor production was evident in the majority of experiments when the cells were stimulated with either of the mitogens. Although the cells from the majority of patients studied did not differ in their behaviour, the cells from three patients with a full-blown syndrome of human monocytic leukaemia (FHL) were more resistant to mitogenic stimulation and produced a smaller amount of tumour necrosis factor than the cells from normal donors. The differential functional behaviour of these human monocytic leukaemia cells in vitro suggest that they are a useful model for studying the altered function of their progeny in the circulation of these patients. In a strong financial statement economy or a weak economy, the profit margin is the number one factor. When a company can increase their profit margin or decrease their cost of goods sold, it will indicate growth for the company. If a company can decrease their cost of goods sold by using increased automation, it will show growth. A company can decrease their cost of goods sold by using increased automation. In my previous post, I listed the five most cost-effective ways to use automation to increase the profit margin. It is important to know which methods of automation to use. In my previous posts, I have talked about the five methods of automation: Increase automation based on work volume Increase automation based on labor cost Increase automation based on mix Increase automation based on quality Increase automation based on return on investment (ROI) This post is about the third category – increase automation based on mix. Increasing Mix based on Automation In a low volume environment with high labor and resource costs, automation does not make much sense. In these conditions, it

People in the field of instant messaging (IM) have in the past years embraced multiuser environments. Today, when someone logs into an IM service on a device, it is typical to see multiple IM windows of different individuals corresponding to different rooms (i.e., different types of communication environments) on the device at the same time. This can occur even if the user is logged into the service on the same device. Unfortunately, the system today does not provide IM clients that allow for easy and natural navigation among different users or rooms, and also that allow for filtering out, or not, the user's "presence" in each room (i.e., the status/availability of the user for each room). In particular, while IM systems can be used to allow for communication between different entities/devices, they are often limited to communication between two entities/devices. For example, if a given IM client on a handheld device is "open" and in use by a first entity, then there will be other entities/devices in the world (e.g., a server) that can be used to communicate with the first entity (e.g., via the IM client). However, those other entities/devices are not accessible from the first entity, and the first entity may not know of their existence in the first entity's IM client. Furthermore, there is a set of rooms in the IM service that are defined by the creator of that service, and there is a set of entities/devices that are allowed to access those rooms. To date, the creation of new rooms (by the service creator) for any IM service is manual and requires that a new room definition be entered into the management system of that service. This has limited the growth of the IM service and the user communities that are tied to the service. Many IM services today also lack a concept of what the "presence" of a particular user is in a particular room. There are different approaches today to provide the user with the presence information about the various rooms. Some solutions, for example, require the user to explicitly indicate (e.g., type in) a specific presence value that is to be associated with a room. Other solutions today are not automated, and require the user to actively participate to indicate his presence for the room. While these approaches work today, they are an obstacle to IM environments in that they require the users to be aware of, and to actively share, their presence status for different rooms.
