My initial approach was something along the lines of: import sys with open(sys.argv[1], 'rb') as f: zf = BinaryParser() for ln in f: zf.addValue(ln) And I can throw values at it and have it parse them out, but I'm trying to get the whole thing split up into some sort of "record class" or something. Something like: class Record: field1: int field2: int def __init__(self, name, value.): self.name = name self.value = value And then have a loop split up the input into these records like: records = [] ln = sys.argv[2] with open(ln, 'rb') as f: while True: record = Record(name = sys.argv[3], value = sys.argv[4]) records.append(record) ... Essentially, how do I tell a Python class to go ahead and append a 'name' and 'value' to a Python list every time it loops through the data?
