Rhythmic motor activity, such as walking or breathing, is controlled by oscillatory activity in the brain's cortical regions responsible for sensorimotor integration and the control of locomotion. Abnormalities in these oscillations are hypothesized to underlie parkinsonian symptoms, but so far no reliable means for clinical assessment of cortical oscillatory activity is available. We therefore investigated the effect of cathodal transcranial direct current stimulation (c-tDCS) on the modulation of theta (4-8 Hz) oscillations in motor cortex by applying tDCS to FDI (first dorsal interosseous) muscles bilaterally while subjects performed isometric force exertions with an analog dynamometer. Subjects used their left and right hands to exert a grip on the dynamometer, and different target forces with their left and right arms. During c-tDCS the target force was set at 20% of the maximal hand force, and the right hand was stimulated during the right-hand and left-hand trials. During the 1-min protocol, c-tDCS increased the theta amplitude in the right hemisphere during right-hand trials ($P = 0.025$). There was no significant effect of c-tDCS on the theta amplitude in the left hemisphere during right-hand trials. This result demonstrates that c-tDCS induces changes in oscillatory motor cortical activity in healthy subjects.
