Wow. I thought I'd never be able to get to the second ending of Hellfire Citadel again (my first playthrough of it was so difficult, I had to go back to a save file from before I had gotten to the spider queen's room), but never did I imagine I'd be so thoroughly overjoyed to get to see that ending again. It was wonderful to see myself back in the past at the beginning of the story, again. To see the old me back to how things were when I first started. Striking back at the invaders (who may be considered "the evil" in that universe, but we'll get into that later) as well as to look into the shadowy past of my people (quite literally, at times), it was a wonderful trip down memory lane that I'll not soon forget. The situation here was quite different, though; instead of slowly and cautiously making my way through the halls of Hellfire Citadel, I was free to dash at a full sprint through the halls, heading to the spider queen's room. I could feel my muscles long to release that pent-up energy, and as I did so, I felt a certain glow in my heart. I could feel the power of my armor's magic, melding with my own augmented strength. I may have been restored to my former glory, but my sense of self had returned as well. When I later found myself standing on the giant mound of bodies that I'd once shed as they had fallen upon me, I could almost forget I was the same man as before. There was no sign of my old body, none that I could see at least, and I could only see myself. I raised my hands over my head, realizing that I could use them again! I was back! I had returned to this world. My world. The old world. The new world. I felt so triumphant. I almost wanted to let loose a cry of relief, but of course, I didn't. I'm a writer, after all. Roses really are red, violets really are blue, and if you grow your own, they really are purple. — Marilyn Monroe, The Seven Year Itch I've been looking forward to this review for quite a while now, because this game is the one that you

This invention relates to an improved apparatus for sensing the position of a traveling member relative to a guide track. In applicant's co-pending patent application Ser. No. 096,913 filed Oct. 5, 1987, assigned to the same assignee as the present application and incorporated herein by reference, an improved position sensing apparatus for a moving member, such as a web-type carton or the like, adapted to be automatically guided through a predetermined course by a chain conveyor or the like is disclosed. More particularly, a sensing apparatus is provided which senses the position of a traveling member relative to a guide rail. In one embodiment, the traveling member is disposed between adjacent links of a conveyor chain and the position of the traveling member is sensed by selectively energizing, or de-energizing a plurality of contact switches located adjacent to the traveling member. In a further embodiment, the traveling member is disposed between a pair of belts which are slightly spaced from each other and the position of the traveling member is sensed by selectively energizing a plurality of resistive elements disposed adjacent to the traveling member. In another embodiment, the traveling member is disposed in a predetermined course and the position of the traveling member is sensed by a plurality of ultrasonic transducers disposed adjacent to the traveling member. In all of the above-mentioned embodiments, the position sensing apparatus includes a plurality of contact switches or resistive elements adjacent to a traveling member adapted to be moved along the predetermined course. In the case of an electrical contact switch, an electrical contact is selectively closed to energize the switch. The particular switch will be energized by a movable contact member which is adapted to engage the switch to energize the same upon the position of the traveling member being sensed. For a resistive element, the particular resistive element is normally electrically insulated, but will be energized to provide a resistance path to the traveling member by a movable member which is adapted to engage the resistive element. The present invention is adapted for use with any of the above-described position sensing apparatus. Thus, applicant's co-pending patent application Ser. No. 096,913 filed Oct. 5, 1987, assigned to the same assignee as the present application and incorporated herein by reference is incorporated by reference thereto for a more complete description of the position sensing apparatus of that invention. The present invention is primarily adapted for use in a printer/graphics workstation wherein the printing of a desired image, such as a logo,
