It also warned that among teens, any known alcohol use could increase the chance of adolescent-onset diabetes by between 60 percent and 250 percent, depending on the person's level of alcohol use, binge drinking and weight. In addition, the report from the American Diabetes Association said in states where the percentage of binge drinkers was already high, such as Mississippi, Louisiana and Kentucky, adding up to five more diabetes cases could be caused by drinking. The report warned binge drinking has also helped increase the likelihood of smoking, HIV and high blood pressure in adolescents, and that regular binge drinking is strongly associated with obesity. The reports said: "Excessive alcohol consumption increases total and LDL (bad) cholesterol, triglycerides and glucose, lowers HDL (good) cholesterol and is associated with weight gain and inflammation, which are risk factors for type 2 diabetes. "While the effects of moderate drinking on total and LDL cholesterol and triglycerides may be neutral or favorable, higher quantities of alcohol increase risk for type 2 diabetes." Alcoholic beverages -- including beer, wine and spirits -- have been found to be more directly linked to the development of type 2 diabetes than other beverages such as juice, milk and soda, said Dr. Alan Eisman, the director of the Division of Diabetes, Endocrinology and Metabolism at the American Diabetes Association. The agency urged people to make healthy drinking choices including limiting consumption of alcohol on special occasions, being involved in their families' and 0cc13bf012
