"As an industry, we demand a better standard for safety," said Efren Pantaleon, president of FTTP, which boasts thousands of members of the general public who want to become pilots. ADVERTISEMENT "In particular, for private pilots, we view training as a form of protection, providing safety for their passengers," he told the Inquirer. The DOT recently ordered all pilot training to end in April, including private jet instruction by FTTP, which conducts training in a new 80,000-square-meter complex in Valenzuela that opened in 2013. FTTP officials insist that private jet training can only be given by certified flight instructors because safety requirements include an array of checks like a prescribed weight limit, a certain safety margin, and adherence to standards for every aspect of the aircraft. It costs as much as P2.1 million annually to secure a private jet, which can seat up to eight passengers, according to FTTP. "It is absurd when we are the ones who are suffering," FTTP official Cyrano Lim said. "We have been pressured by DOT. We've been monitoring the record of those who have trained before us. We are the one who are asked to stop." However, the DOT's decision "makes no sense," Lim said. "It's actually a problem for us." ADVERTISEMENT "We don't want to make a hostile environment. We want to build good ties with DOT. We don't want to give DOT excuses for bad conduct," he said. FTTP has allegedly already lost some 40 clients due to the DOT decision, according to Lim.
