There have been other apps available for the iPad over the last couple of years that will let you look at, add comments and work on (modify) your files. You can take a look at those apps and try them out if you want before making an investment in Adobe's one. The Apple Pencil is also a very capable stylus that works in the same way as an ordinary pen and will respond to the same gestures. The true advantage of the Apple Pencil is that its on-screen user interface works with an app that knows all about documents like Photoshop and sees their relationship to each other. If you'd like to take a look at several examples of the kinds of shared documents we can do in Lightroom, you can try out these Adobe examples here. If you're a Lightroom or Photoshop user, you've probably got a 30-day review window on your product. If you input a review to an Adobe Design Review app, we'll put the file into Adobe's headless review— Feedback app. In Photoshop, you may have been used to referring to the review panel as comments because it works like comments in social media or your email inbox. These comments can be added during a file's review or via an external reviewer, and are added to the file, which remains open in Photoshop, until the review is done or you proceed with another task. Ever since I first installed Photoshop, I have welcomed the prospect of a more spectacular version of it on my iPad. Now that I have upgraded, I can't wait to see what it has to offer compared to what I have done in Adobe Photoshop Elements and Photoshop Lightroom.
