The Import panel is a bit different in the new version of Lightroom. I don't mind the changes, too, because the previous version had a couple of drawbacks. For one thing, it was difficult to navigate through images using the browser. The new Control+E is much easier to get to and easier to use than F10's "e" for "export". Selective masks are a new feature in Lightroom 5. Now that it's here, it's a great time to try it. Adobe made a lot of improvements to the editing system in Lightroom 5, particularly to the layers panel. For instance, it now maintains the previous projects' settings, so it remembers where you were and what you were doing. It also no longer only allows you to see the current edits (camouflage, fill, exposure, brightness, etc). Now you can also see what the rest of your editing history was, even if you don't bring the current image up right now. It still remembers the sequence of edits, the presets and other specific settings you've used. The new Audiobook Import workflow from the Adobe Collection is very convenient. With it, you can import audiobooks from CDs and DVDs. Once they're in your library, you can choose to make an audiobook from it. Lightroom also tags the image with metadata such as author and title. Previous Lightroom versions did not allow you to do this and I found this workflow too cumbersome because you had to copy the audiobook out of the disc to your hard drive first. The ability to save a custom Lightroom preset is really handy. I use it all the time when labelling images. I like to set the categories at different levels of importance and then save the preference into a specific folder. Now you don't have to create a new preset for each folder, you can just save the preset in the Library and use it right away from other images.

You can scroll up and down to bring up the layer channels and the image layer at the same time. To turn the animation off, click the jump arrow at the bottom left of the Review tab. To access the Curves panel, drag the Curves icon (top left) and release it on an adjustment layer. Multiple levels of smooth (registration) adjustments are available. You can't use them directly, but you can drag them to the Channels panel for more control. The Adjustments panel shows the currently enabled adjustment - it's the one with the green arrow. You activate it by clicking the "▶" icon (next to the adjustment layer name), then drag the gray box to the affected adjustment layer and release it. This changes the visible section of the adjustment layer to white — and the part you select now applies that effect. The Saved panel allows you to save adjustments that you've created in the file. These are like preset adjustments that you can apply to any image, but are independent of the image you're opening.
