Lightroom 6 includes the Adobe Sensei AI feature. It's been there in Lightroom for years, but it's never been given a place to live until now. Adobe Sensei is complex AI software that transforms mundane tasks into something more pleasing to work with. For example, it's able to size photos, crop to the perfect shape, straighten a crooked photo that's been taken with a sloppy hand, explain what's going on in a photo, take a photo of a sunset for you, decipher a messy archive, and so on. Adobe Sensei is able to do so much thanks to two massive pieces of data: image data (color and grayscale) and metadata data, which includes information about a photo like where and when it was taken, what equipment was used, and how long ago it was shot. Here's the catch: It can't be used without a huge Adobe stock of images, which include tens of millions of photos, taken by hundreds of photographers from around the world. Adobe has built a massive database of the images from the shared Flickr, VSCO, and Creative Cloud Libraries. It's quite likely that the AI is able to use that data to improve an image. I haven't used this feature, but I can only imagine that Adobe Sensei works really well. I'm using the app, after testing each feature a number of times, but it's pretty easy to interact with and open up. It's more of a—well, I'm not quite sure how to describe it. I think of it as a virtual assistant, if you will. For example, you can ask the question "What's the difference between a local and a foreign move?" and the AI will know and act based on that answer, rather than instantly providing the answer.
