Pralhad Shinde Bhakti geete kartavya download.Q: Can I terminate a metafunction upon it failing? I have a class template (which I don't own) that has metafunctions such as

template struct some_trait {}; template struct
some_trait { typedef T type;
}; template struct some_trait
{ typedef some_trait::type
type; }; template struct

some_trait { typedef
some_trait::type type; };
template struct some_trait {
typedef some_trait::type
type; };

When the argument T has a const type, a variable of that type would like to, if possible, assign a non-const object of that type to it. I am using this to avoid unnecessary code bloat caused by unnecessary and occasionally undesirable copies. I expect to be able to write the following: template

some_trait::some_func(const T& t) { return t; }

Since the first value that `some_trait::some_func` would be called with is `const`, any call with that argument wouldn't change anything. It would still need to be passed in as a `const` reference. The above would be fine except `some_trait::some_func` would be called with some references that might need to be changed. For example,

const std::list lt; const T t = some_trait::some_func(lt);
would be valid, even though some_trait::some_func can't modify the contents of the list, it may be able to change the list itself. The point of this is I would like the above to succeed, even though it may result in some_trait::some_func being unable to change the contents of lt ( f988f36e3a
