The study examined differences in the care received by twins and singletons and the outcomes in these two groups. We studied all twins and singletons delivered at Queen Charlotte's and Chelsea Hospital between April 1996 and September 1998. We compared results from perinatal and neonatal outcome measurements in twins and singletons, with respect to the stage of gestation, mode of delivery, and the type of obstetrician delivering the babies. Of 4,781 deliveries, 1,191 (26%) were twins and 3,590 (74%) were singletons. There were significant differences in perinatal and neonatal outcomes between twins and singletons at different stages of gestation. However, this could not be explained by the type of obstetrician. These differences highlight the role of factors other than mode of delivery in determining the birth 2edc1e01e8
